Exports are the goods and services a country produces domestically and sells to businesses or customers who reside in a foreign country. This results in an influx of funds to the country that is selling their goods and services. Companies may choose to export their products and services to a foreign country because it allows them to:

- Participate in global trade
- Access new markets
- Increase revenue

Usually companies export goods or services in areas where they have a competitive advantage over other companies because their product or service is superior. They may also export commodities they produce naturally that other countries lack based on climate and geography. For example, Jamaica, Kenya and Columbia all have a climate suitable for growing coffee. This helps fuel their ability to export this product to foreign countries that can't produce coffee in their region.
